study we have investigated the effect of the particle size of dehydrated raw latex particles on interfacial adhesion and water uptake. Particles were prepared from commercial monotetrafluorochloroethane

(MFTE) cured and uncured latex. Two particle sizes, both 10 microns (10), were used in this study and compared with a 10 microns extruded raw latex (uncured). Interfacial adhesion and water uptake of the various particles were measured by a penetration meter.

Results indicate that uncured extruded rubber particles retain greater interfacial adhesion and have greater water uptake than the dried raw latex particles.

Cured particles have less water uptake and adhere less to the mirror.

Particle size has little or no influence on adhesion or on the magnitude of water uptake of uncured rubber particles after curing or drying. The results are interpreted as evidence that water is retained on the surface of uncured particles and that the particle surface appears to be hydrophobic.
